Character Selvedge

BY ADA PATTERSON.

We have all studied the selvedge of the cloth from which our gowns are made, but who has given any study to character selvedge? The rough edge that keeps the cloth from fraying, that gives it strength and durability, is the selvedge. Every character is a fabric, sombre or bright in color, in one continuous tone, or shot with many lights and shades, and each has its rough, finishing edge; its selvedge.

Yesterday I had a glimpse of several character selvedges. I met on a crowded car on the homeward way a successful young business woman. I know that in her small domain she is brilliantly efficient, and that, moreover, all her acts in that little world are tinged with human kindness. But in the second largest city in the world I met with the transit of its working citizens the selvedge of the business woman's character revealed itself.

The end of a hard day's work was in the face that had that morning been bright. She was tired. She was a bit overborne by the warfare of the day. She was irritated by the wretched accommodations afforded to the home-goers, and she would have liked to efface from this earth the huge man who had walked across her aching feet. The light had all gone out of the face that was that morning bright. The smile with which she usually faced the world had retreated behind a frown. She looked many shades plainer and many years older.

I saw a meeting between two girls; saw the indifferent greeting of one and the sensitive flush and the surprised look in the eyes of the other, and I recalled what the late H. De Witt Talmage told his children who complained that a friend had seemed less cordial than usual when they met him on Broadway at noon.

"Broadway and noon don't make for cordiality from a hard-worked, hard-pressed business man, my dears," he made gentle answer. "Remember, if your friends seem a shade less friendly some days than others, that we all have our preoccupations." Preoccupied moods are selvedge of the characters of those who lead busy lives.

For a half hour I listened a little impatiently to the chatter of a middle-aged widow. I knew that this woman had been a staunch and noble wife. Her business acumen had drawn her husband out of the morass of bankruptcy and placed him upon the heights of affluence. And yet, as I listened, I came to the conclusion that this woman, peering the compliments of fortune-hunting suitors, who laughed at her susceptibility and calculated her fortune behind her back when they were not gazing with simulated sentiment into her eyes. I had to recall the fair, the fabric of the woman's previous life, the sacrifices she had made, the genuine devotion she had shown, and turn my eyes from her pitiful, contemptible vanity—her character selvedge.

I listened to a speech that was the defilement of money. I heard a woman who has tasted deep of the sorrows of life, and climbed the heights of its joys, say: "Nothing matters much except having enough money." And again money had to be reverent to the real fabric of her character, her strong motherly love, the breadth and tenderness of her charities. Her mercenary conclusion was merely the rough edge—the selvedge.

One whom I had known as all gentleness, all loyalty, told me she was prosaically in spirit because she had that day "seen red in one of her ragged." "I was so angry that I actually ran right into some one I knew on the street and didn't know her," she said. "I was like an enraged yearling I saw bump his head and hurt himself horribly against the barb wire fence of the pasture." But the rage had been caused by hearing an ill-natured gossip of one of her friends. I have said that I had known this girl as all loyalty. Her loyalty produced the blind rage—character selvedge!
